 by order in Council. Looking at that circumstance that whether you regard it as a matter of principle, or of expediency, the competition of a very title to executive appointments has already been by both Houses, it seems to me that it is not a matter of principle that the House whether House has adopted is so small that, considering many points they have given way, and that this practice nor theory can be called a large modification of the principle of competition. I do not accept the amendments of the House of Lords, Sir, in preference of the competitive system, to a
