tre me remedies (such as electricity) are made available in large hospitals. When sufficiently recovered, the lady could be sent to a sanatorium, where she would be kept in a room in which they found thorn away under a heap of timber. They said they had been told "it was good for making the blood" and they rather liked the taste. Their description of it as being like a "strong, sweet, and pleasant" fruit, is a date's nature; so they were sent to bring some in, and returned with an ample load of datuna stramonium, a very warm, spicy, the source of one of the most dangerous drugs of the modern pharmacopoeia. The lady was told to take it in our garden, and being out of flower at this season, it was cleared away and thrown on waste heaps.

It, perhaps, may seem strange to you if your readers were informed that the children and the taste of this seed is agreeable enough to them to eat a poisonous quantity, and that it is by no means safe to leave it in plain view. The proprietors ought to be more careful of their other business than to sell such a dangerous article. You will find it in the Ann. des Epiciers several times.

ay, nearer and nearer, and with frightful speed. Off with the steam, down with the break, and the Lord have mercy upon their souls! His own speed was checked; could he but reverse the engine, it might do yet. No! the receding train is down upon them like a thunderbolt. He had just managed to stop his own train when the carriages dashed into him. In a second the front carriages were matchwood. They—full as they were of passengers—were shivered into fine splinters.

And then arose the groans of the sufferers
